Does retinol really help?

Retinol and retinoids are medications that bind to retinoic acid receptors within the skin, where they turn on good genes (like the ones that promote collagen production) and turn off bad genes (such as the one that prompts the production of an enzyme that breaks down collagen). Collagen production slows in your 30's, so the earlier you start a retinol, the better for your skin. Retinoids help promote the skin's natural exfoliation process so the skin can look healthy and glow while helping to smooth fine lines and wrinkles.

Start slowly, and only apply your retinol every third night at first. Then, increase to every other night, then every night once you know your skin can tolerate it. Dryness and flaking are occasional side effects when starting to use a retinol, but if you stick with it, you'll see the skin improvement is well worth it.

The proper skincare regimen is the key for healthy, youthful skin—we at the Dermatology and Skin Cancer Institute have specialized training that allows us to accurately diagnose your skin type and recommend the ideal skincare products.
